

The revolution reshuffled the apparatus without renewing it

Appointments roughly doubled after 2011 and peaked in 2013 (a), but the share of appointees appearing in the gazette for the first time barely moved, from 30% to 35% (b). The churn rate among sitting postholders rose only to 8%, below the 12% of Ben Ali's 1987 takeover and below most of the 1990s (c): the state published more appointments because it had grown, not because it turned over harder. Panels (c) and (d) measure movement into posts rather than departure from them: only 5% of spells are closed by an act that states the exit, so departure cannot be counted directly.
