

After 2011 the provinces were demoted, not the ministry

A demotion is a move to a lower-ranked post. Taken whole the security apparatus was no worse treated than anyone else after the revolution — 31% of its moves went down in 2011–13 against 31% for the rest of the state, and both rose together. The split is the finding: the territorial arm went from 24% before the revolution to 45% after, on 140 and 213 moves, and those Wilson intervals do not overlap; the central interior ministry went from 21% to 24%, a +2-point move against the territorial +20. Nor did it revert — the territorial rate stands at 52% in the three years before 2021. Right: where the demoted territorial officials landed. 28 governors fell from 80 to 57 on the rank scale; secrétaires généraux fell furthest, 70 to 30.

Source: Journal Officiel de la République Tunisienne, 1957–2026 (6,378 French issues, jort.tn). Author's extraction. A demotion is a move to a strictly lower rank on the codebook's ordinal scale: the same person, the next appointment the gazette records for them, lower than the one before. A lateral move at equal rank is not counted, and neither is leaving the record — a career that stops cannot be told from a career the register stops following, so purges that ended in dismissal rather than demotion are outside this figure and would if anything make the pattern stronger. Each point is a three-year window: a single year of territorial moves runs to a median of twenty-six and thins below fifteen in the 1960s, while every window drawn here clears twenty-five. The band on the territorial series is its Wilson interval; the other two are drawn without one to keep the plate readable, and rest on far larger samples. The territorial branch is the security administration outside the capital — governorates, regional commissariats, delegations — and the central branch is the interior ministry proper; the split is the one scripts/apparatus.py already used for the outflow figures. On the other ruptures: 1987 moves the same way, 27% to 53%, but on thirty-seven moves before the coup the intervals overlap and it cannot be called; 2021 does not move. 2011 is the only rupture in the record where this jump is separable from chance. Ranks on the right are medians over the demoted, and a post appears only where at least five people held it.