

Ben Ali replaced the apparatus slowly; the revolution did it at once; Saïed has not

Personnel acts per issue of the Journal Officiel around three changes of regime, over the five years after each.

Dividing by issues published removes the fourfold growth of the gazette between 1987 and 2011. All three begin with a freeze, and then diverge. 1987 climbs year on year to half again above its baseline by year five. 2011 spends its replacement in one burst at nine months and subsides below baseline. 2021 returns to its baseline and stops there: no year of the five reaches 1.02 times it.

Source: Journal Officiel de la République Tunisienne, 1957–2026 (6,378 French issues, jort.tn). Author's extraction. Baseline is the mean rate over months –24 to –13. The record is cut at May 2026: an act dated in one month appears in an issue published later, so the last months held are missing acts not yet gazetted. The cut matters - read to the final month held, the 2021 series peaks at 1.37× baseline at +31, and read three months earlier at 1.15× at +31. The yearly means move by at most 0.05 between those two readings, which is why they, and not a peak, are what the figure states. In 1987 the sharpest single month precedes the rupture: Ben Ali was interior minister from April and prime minister from October of that year.
