

The governorship has stopped being a promotion from within

Every appointment to a governorship in the record, by the post the person held immediately before it and the regime in force at the time. Of the 255 appointments whose predecessor is in the record, 108 come from inside the interior apparatus — a governorate, the ministry, or another governorship — and the share falls era by era, 66% to 39% to 32%; the first and last of those do not overlap at 95%. The remaining 146 appointments have no earlier gazetted post at all. What also moves is the pace: After the revolution replaces governors at 12.9 a year against 3.8, 5.4, 3.9 for the others.

A governor's organisation is recorded sometimes as the governorate and sometimes as the interior ministry, and for a few decrees as whatever ministry headed the page — one run of territorial governors is filed under foreign affairs. The organisation is used for one thing only: the head of the central bank is also a gouverneur and carries the same rank, and all twelve of those spells name the Banque Centrale where no territorial governor's does. A governor with no earlier gazetted post is not one who came from nowhere: the gazette records appointments, so a first appearance is a first gazetted post and may follow a career in the party, the army, or outside the state. That group is shown rather than dropped. Era windows run from five years to twenty-seven, so each carries a rate as well as a count; the last is open at the end of the record and its rate is the least settled. Two limits on the fall in the subtitle. The Saïed era contributes ten appointments with a known predecessor and an interval of 6 to 51 points, so it is drawn but is no part of the claim. And the share with no earlier gazetted post is itself uneven across eras — 47%, 28%, 33%, 47% — so if an official already inside the administration is likelier to have a gazetted predecessor, a thinner early record would inflate the early inside share. Part of the fall may be the record improving rather than the practice changing.
