

The last two posts before the centre

All 1,275 three-step approaches to the two offices: the bloc a career was in two posts before arriving, the bloc it was in immediately before, and which office it reached. Each path holds one band through the middle column, so a ribbon can be followed across the whole diagram rather than only within a stage. Foreign affairs appears somewhere in the last two posts of 16% of approaches to the presidency against 12% of those to the prime minister's office, so the tilt the one-step figure found survives a step further back. The centre feeds itself: it is the largest single bloc two posts before an arrival.

An approach is a post in one of the two offices with two earlier posts in the same career, consecutive posts in one organisation collapsed so that what is counted is the crossing. Organisations are grouped into eight blocs because at three steps the named routes are single figures — the commonest path into the presidency through two named predecessors is walked by nine people — and the two offices are one bloc in the first two columns, where the question is what kind of body a career passed through rather than which office. The diagram has a tail: 36 of its 113 left-hand ribbons carry fewer than five people and between them 7% of the flow. They are drawn so the column totals are honest, not to be read one by one. Three-step approaches are a subset of the arrivals in the one-step figure — 1,275 of 2,078 — because a career must have two earlier posts in the record to appear here at all, and which careers do is itself uneven across the period.
