

The presidency recruits from the outward-facing state, the prime minister's office from the domestic one

The post held immediately before an arrival at each office, as a share of that office's arrivals. The counts to the left of each row are prime minister's office and presidency. The two offices draw on different parts of the administration: foreign affairs, public works send a larger share of their movers to the presidency, while finance, municipalities, social affairs, governorates send a larger share to the prime minister's office. Foreign affairs alone supplies 12% of the presidency's arrivals against 7% of the prime minister's.

Source: Journal Officiel de la République Tunisienne, 1957–2026 (6,378 French issues, jort.tn). Author's extraction. An arrival is a post in one of the two offices preceded in the same career by a post elsewhere, consecutive posts in one organisation collapsed so that what is counted is the crossing. Origins supplying fewer than 40 arrivals across both offices are not drawn: below that the two shares are being compared on a handful of people. The two offices feed each other — the prime minister's office is the second largest single source of arrivals at the presidency — and that row is left out here because it answers a different question from which parts of the administration supply the centre. The interval is Wilson on the presidency's share, the smaller of the two bases; a filled pair means it excludes the prime minister's office's share. Shares are of arrivals, not of the originating body's size, so a large ministry can lead on count without leading on either share. Two-step approaches are not drawn: the commonest route into the presidency through two named predecessors is walked by nine people.