

The revolution fell on the courts and the treasury; 2021 fell on the interior ministry

Appointments in the three years after each rupture against the four years before, divided by the same ratio for the apparatus as a whole, by policy domain. A point to the right of the line marks a ministry reshaped harder than the rest of the state; to the left, one left comparatively alone.

Merged ministries are counted toward each domain they merge, because the portfolio key follows the ministry's name and would otherwise break at every rename: read literally, the interior ministry makes 1.5 appointments a year before 2011 and 70 before 2021, an artefact of its having been the ministry of the Interior and Local Development until 2011. Domains with fewer than 12 appointments a year before a rupture are not plotted for it; defence, trade and women's affairs fall below that throughout. Governorates and municipalities are the interior ministry's field administration but are filed under their own form, not its portfolio, so this understates its reach.
